A personal story from the interior designer and stylist Magda Zabierzowska: – My home is a collection of different styles that somehow come together to create harmony. From antiques and Asia to 60's furniture and Japanese neons. Every corner of the house has its own world represented by what I call little altars filled with tiny collectibles and carefully arranged pieces. I treat my space according to the theory of tabula rasa. The walls are blank canvases and the interior an empty space that grows and changes with me. Including the free growing garden, I let my home live its own life, just how I live mine. As an interior designer, I often hear that creating your own space is the toughest job. For my own home, I wanted to combine the feeling of timelessness and the charm of old objects with modern and funky elements. I try to avoid falling into the trap of following every new trend and I think a home should be outside of fashion to make it timeless. My home is a reflection of my personality, the way I perceive the world, my inspirations, and taste. I am a collector. I love objects, the less useful the better. Every item I've collected has its own unique story and I am truly attached to all of them. In my collection, I have pieces passed from my great grandparents and taken from my family home. Most of the objects, however, I have brought back from my trips to Asia. Asia enchanted me with its colours, smells, and hand-craft. Whenever I go there I come back with suitcases full of new pieces. Lamps, furniture, masks, and little collectibles. If I can't fit something in the luggage or bring it on my lap I ship it home. In China, I found beautiful hand-painted silk lanterns which later came home in a huge wooden box that barely fit in the garage. In Vietnam, I found amazing masks and colourful rugs.
